FES (Friedrich-Ebert-Stiftung) and WIDE+ (Women In Development Europe+) would like to invite you to the last of a series of 4 webseminars around implementing an intersectional feminist approach.

About the Topic

An intersectional approach has been introduced in public policy making. In this session we will discuss examples, dilemmas, challenges, like: 'how can we gather data from an intersectional approach?', 'what are common pitfalls when policy makers aim to introduce an intersectional approach, learning from the common limitations of a gender mainstreaming approach?', and: 'how do we deal with power relations between marginalized groups and policy makers or researchers?'

Dr. Patricia Muñoz-Cabrera has been combining research with a professional career for and within public bodies and non-governmental organisations. She has always included an intersectional perspective in her work, which has re-sulted in her role as policy advisor, evaluator and trainer in gender equality from an intersectional perspective for the European Union, the Council of Eu-rope, the European Institute for Gender Equality (EIGE) and the Ministry of Foreign Affairs in the Netherlands. She obtained her PHD at the Free Universi-ty of Brussels, Belgium and continued her research career at the University of Sao Paulo, Brazil. Born in Atacama, North of Chile, Patricia is currently based in in Beijing, China.

Moana Genevey is a Policy Officer at Equinet, the European Network of Equality Bodies. She is specifically in charge of gender equality and other strategic equality policy issues within the network. She is an equality and gender expert who has worked extensively on gender-based discrimination, harassment and violence, at na-tional, European and international level. Ms. Genevey previously worked at the Eu-ropean Commission, the EU Delegation to the United Nations in New York and the European Network Against Racism. She has authored several publications, , including her Awarded Thesis on political hate speech and the limits of law, and a Policy Brief on intersectional policy-making and feminist movements.

Sabrina Saase (without pronoun) is a researcher doing a PhD at Technical University Braunschweig in cooperation with Sigmund Freud University Berlin. Sabrina Saase is part of the research group "Quantitative intersectionality research – development of a gender theoretically informed toolbox for health studies". Core topics are antidiscrimination and intersectionality focusing mainstreaming ageing, gender and diversity as well as social competencies needed for more social justice especially for academic and therapeutic training and institutions.

Sabrina Saase works as a trainer in governmental organizations and has worked for the United Nations (UNECE – Economic Commission for Europe), for different NGOs in Indonesia and Germany and is teaching on several universities fostering intersectionality as a concept and a research perspective especially in quantitative research.

Moderator Gisela Dütting is an anthropologist by training and specialized in social movements, gender and economic justice. Between 1991 and 1998, she was the Director of the Women's Global Network for Reproductive Rights, campaigning internationally with 1600 groups. She has more than 25 years of experience deployed on long- and short-term assignments for trade unions, public interest networks, social movements and women's organisations in over 35 countries.

From 2017-2020, she was the Senior Specialist Gender and Livelihood to UN Women, in the department of Women, Peace & Security and Humanitarian Action. Currently, she is seconded by the Netherlands Ministry of Foreign Affairs as a Gender expert to the EU. She has been in the board of various organisations, among them the Transnational Institute and WIDE.
